Figurines.

The figurines found at Piedras Negras during the field seasons of 1934 and 1935 fit into the pattern established by the finds of the preceding three seasons. The human figurine heads belong to Style X, being mouldmade, or so modelled as to conform to mouldmade technique, with no examples of archaic or archaistic treatment. All recognizable figurine fragments were found in building debris or in the soil. None had datable associations, either with monuments, or stratigraphy.

Seventeen of the human heads have the headform designated as A, that shows a high head with flattened forehead and receding jaw. Nine heads have Form B, with a square, chubby face, and five of these have the sugarloaf head found with B only in the Usumacinta region. There are three examples of Headform C.

Most recognizable headdresses are variants of the stepped, hood, and turban types. One B head has a crudely modelled animal headdress that suggests the upper half of a bird head, another (fig. 1) has asymmetrical crests of hair on either side of a bald pate. Two heads from the same building, one A, the other C?, have a headdress that suggests a derivation of the bird headdress found on other Style X figurines. Two heads have two rings applied to the forehead, in a manner reminiscent of Toltec figurines. One is an A head found with the two that have a possible bird headdress, the other is a badly weathered B head. A fragment shows the top of a mask headdress like those on stelae at Copan and Quirigua, (fig. 3).

A double-globe whistle (fig. 5), with a mouthpiece for each chamber providing a two-note range, has a section of roughened surface where the globes join. There was probably plastic decoration here, very likely a human head, that has been broken away.

A pottery plaque fragment, on which a human face is conventionalized to fit an oblong shape (fig. 6), has a narrow edge with holes in it on the under side at right angles to the surface. This suggests that the plaque was sewn to something else or used as a lid to be fastened down.

- 4 loc. cit., X 4.

The eight animal heads found also conform to mouldmade technique, with the exception of one crudely modelled bird with pellets for eyes. The animals represented are the puma, dog?, frog?, snake (fig. 4), bird, and a rodent.

Vessel Ornaments.

A fine mouldmade grotesque head with a beard and filed teeth (fig. 7), is set on the top of the handle of a ladle censer at the rim, ^{of the vessel} facing inward. The headdress, which contains possible bird elements, the round bead necklace, and the arms, which follow the juncture of handle and vessel, are applied. The head doubtless represents the god to whom incense was offered in the ladle, and provides a fairly close prototype in shape as well as idea for the modern Lacandon censer from the same region.

Fragments of a fantastic, white-washed animal (fig. 8) offer further evidence of the effigy censers suggested by the finds of other years, but as yet none has been found complete enough for reconstruction. An anthropomorphic animal effigy vessel foot was found, resembling the one reported from 1933, and the frog? referred to in the figurine section was apparently attached to the side of a bowl.

It is clear, then, that this material adds nothing as yet to our knowledge of Piedras Negras or Maya history, but that it does expand our data about types already established.
